The loan is used for the purpose of paying off an existing mortgage or creating a loan for the buyer of the home, or to provide income during retirement. While a traditional mortgage loan requires the borrower to borrow the money, then repay it, the reverse mortgage requires the borrower to take the proceeds, then repay the loan from the proceeds. The lender makes a loan to the homeowner, with the homeowner making a loan to the lender, in the same way a traditional mortgage would work. Legal requirements Reverse mortgages, or reverse loans, are a type of loan, regulated by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the states. In some states, such as North Carolina, state laws are in place to protect seniors from exploitation by payday lenders. This is called the false urgency statute, and it was developed to prevent an increase in the number of elderly individuals who were being sold loans they could not afford. Reverse mortgages are also not tied to bank loans, and thus are not subject to the same federal restrictions as traditional loans. In addition to ensuring the protection of individuals who may be vulnerable to a financial scam, states have enacted laws to protect reverse mortgage borrowers from unscrupulous activities such as foreclosure during times of emergencies, and to provide legal assistance to those who experience problems. Some states have also recently passed laws that help older homeowners pay for home repairs to avoid foreclosures. Some states, such as New York, require sellers of homes to include at least one month's worth of funds when listing the property for sale
