After the introduction of the pipedrive, the digital certificates among the client and the server can also be issued. A certificate contains a serial number, expiration date, the owner's identity and the issuer's identity. To be able to do this, the certificate must be pre-issued by the certificate authorities to the user and stored on their computers. However, every computer that is able to communicate with a server or request a resource on that server, must have a copy of the public key as well as the private key of this key pair. After the Certificate Authority (CA) issues a private key for an entity, it generates a corresponding public key which is normally included in the public record of the entity issued. In the digital signature, the private key is used to sign the data to be authenticated, while the corresponding public key is used to verify the authenticity of the signature. This means that after this the higher application of the private key is encrypted. In this way the message can only be decrypted using the private key of the recipient. An example is when the message is encrypted so that only the recipient can decrypt it, so that the message is only readable by the recipient. High: - amule-informer
