GABA(B) receptor activation plays a critical role in pain modulation and nociceptive sensitization. However, the mechanisms underlying this potentiation of pain are not fully understood. Here we show that GABA(B) receptor activation, in either peripheral or central nervous system compartments, sensitizes human dorsal root ganglion (DRG) neurons to noxious mechanical stimulation via the activation of Nav1.7 channel. A selective GABA(B) receptor agonist, baclofen, produces an increase in the excitability of DRG neurons in a concentration-dependent manner, with an EC(50) of 0.72 μ M. Using gene-silencing techniques, we find that the baclofen-induced increase in excitability requires activation of Nav1.7 channels, which in turn results in activation of the downstream effector transient receptor potential cation channel subfamily M member 8 (TRPM8) channels. Furthermore, intrathecal administration of baclofen significantly increases the mechanical threshold in a neuropathic pain model. These data show that GABA(B) receptor activation sensitizes human DRG neurons to noxious mechanical stimulation via the activation of Nav1.7 channels, and provide a possible basis for the development of new treatments for pain.#region LICENSE // ----- LICENSE
