Such a device is known from the prior art, for example from the publication "Wearable computers, commodity computers, and the open hardware movement" by Merle Callaway. It contains a unit for receiving a removable recording medium which is also referred to as a recording device, a processing unit and a unit for reading information from the recording medium. The processing unit, which is also referred to as a paper computer because this device is intended to function in a completely paper-free manner, can be designed for a variety of uses. One possible use is to have the processing unit function as a book reader, in which the processing unit is designed to process the records which are read-in from the recording medium and which are subsequently transferred to a digital memory. Alternatively, the processing unit could be designed for other purposes, such as an electronic notebook. This would involve the processing unit processing the records which have been read-in from the recording medium and transferring the record data to a digital memory. A further possible function of such a device is to be able to recognize the content of the records read-in and to enter the content of the records into a digital memory. Finally, such a device can also be used to transfer the record data to a storage medium which can be loaded into a personal computer. A disadvantage of such a device is that the recording medium must always be supplied by the person to whom it was originally intended and that the person who uses the device must possess a recording medium for use with it.
