A primary channel provides a transmitter for sending a signal or radiation from a transmitter to a secondary channel or a receiver. The secondary channel provides a receiver for receiving the signal or radiation from the primary channel and is located in a different location from the primary channel. An antenna receives the signal or radiation from the primary channel and delivers the signal to the secondary channel. A mismatch exists between the primary and secondary channels because of electrical, mechanical or other differences between the primary channel and the secondary channel. These electrical, mechanical or other differences can be due to geometric mismatch, tolerance, etc., or other causes. The mismatch causes the primary and secondary channels to be out of phase with each other. This out of phase relationship manifests itself in the form of a constant phase or amplitude offset which must be corrected for by synchronization or equalization techniques. When the first signal is provided as an analog signal, the resulting offset is a DC-offset which needs to be removed.
