Computer users have been able to create and manipulate raster (bitmap) images from the dawn of time. All the first computers were really just giant sequencers that could reproduce and change images at the pixel level. That's where the name "raster" comes from. Using a smart device like a phone or tablet computer can be a tremendous boon to a photographer's workflow. However, new technology and image standards that don't support printing on paper are challenging the concept of printing in the digital realm as well. ## Picking a photo editing application When making any photo editing decision, the most important thing you can do is understand your editing objectives, because it determines the right photo editing application for you.

The Appelbaum study underscores the need to take an additional step: retro-fitting furniture and other objects with RFIDs on a global scale in order to allow for unobstructed mobility. Most popular — if not beloved — amongst RFID supporters is the example of airport workers who can be tracked from end to end at a concourse or across multiple terminals. That was the maximum security promise offered when “dangers” — including, perhaps, terrorism — were deemed to outweigh the privacy implications. The fancy name for that is Janus, the robotic system you might have seen in The Matrix. Janus and its ilk have the power to read IDs as well as lock and unlock doors. One of the many questions in the discussion is whether this particular technology was part of the original plan — or whether it was the result of PR compromise. It’s assumed, but not definitively established, that airports are looking for ways to use technology to save money. I’m skeptical about the argument that a system of automatic doors at airports can’t be “smarter” than a human attendant, but you see that in the very same industry. Robots have been training and working for decades for the LA Live complex in Culver City. They have the same robots helping commuters to get from Point A to Point B, and the same ID system that enables them to charge for driving, waiting or luggage assistance. (A kind of peccadillo in airports will not be a priority.) An interesting question is, why is Smith making the first proposal with which to hold governments to a higher standard than any other sector? Is this specific technology even a good fit for the concept of individual privacy, or is it a favorable one? The USAID report on the Khmer Rouge’s mass elimination of infants [PDF] is one such example. Much of the horror has been described, but the agency obtained and summarized a number of documents that were not in the public sphere prior to the report. These documents are the most incriminating ever collected on the regime’s willful destruction of the most vulnerable. One report worth reading is the one that deals with Daffodil, a women’s hospital. It’s clear that some of those who sought to harm the integrity of the institution moved in a deliberate step-by-step way to eliminate Daffodil’s staff and facilities — while carefully isolating it from
