Fecal contamination of a patient's drinking water is frequently caused by human or animal feces. Fecal testing for pathogens or indicator bacteria is a common strategy to exclude water contamination; however, a negative test result is not definitive. Water quality may be jeopardized if the fecal indicator bacteria concentration is no longer in compliance with water-quality standards. The occurrence of fecal contamination can be assessed using specialized methods, but it is still difficult to accurately assess the adequacy of water-absorption parameters. Colonoscopy is a highly sensitive diagnostic tool but is expensive and not available for most patients. Colonoscopy may be a valuable tool to evaluate colonic responses to diarrhea in order to assess the adequacy of clinical diarrhea (stool output and signs of dehydration). Diagnosis of childhood diarrhea complicated by the absence of stool output or hypovolemia is challenging. We evaluated whether measurement of a mucosal brush combined with stool evaluation might be useful to evaluate the absorption of luminal contents in children with diarrhea. Colonoscopy and mucosal brush cytology were performed on 11 healthy children and 11 children with acute watery diarrhea. On colonoscopy, villus morphology was evaluated and mucosal size was measured. A cytology brush was inserted into the lumen of the colon and flushed with air. DNA was extracted from the cytology brush and diluted feces were extracted for bacterial real-time polymerase chain reaction (PCR) analyses. Mucosal brush cytology was positive for bacteria in all control subjects and all patients with
